FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY

To Whom It May Concern:

This letter's intent is not to make an argument for FCC enforcement on the amount of educational programs aired on television. You are acquainted with all of the studies as well as I. This is a simple demand for stricter enforcement. This only seems prudent, for it seems that controlling the amount of violence exposed to children will result in much government financial savings by having less criminal actions having to be dealt with in our courts, and then having to be dealt with in finding room and money for incarceration of those convicted.

The key to this problem does indeed seem to be enforcement. The proliferation of violent and useless children's programs on television is because they are cheaper and easier to produce. Since this is the case, the only way to change what is being aired is enforcement of quality standards.
